"The Swamp Angel."

The shrewdness of Mrs. Beecher Stowe in carrying on an attack is quite equal to that of General Joe Johnston in a retreat. She has an eye for a vantage ground as sharp as that which marked and mapped every announcements to be published at these rates natural rampart and bulwark of mountain and forest and river from Chattanooga to Atlanta. The principles she follows we commend to the literary strategists of all countries and all future ages. It is the principle of the bombardment-known to military men from the beginning-but somewhat novel in literature: this principle-that to assail an adversary successfully you must take a position of offence where your enemy cannot get at you. Such were Mrs. Stowe's tactics in the Uncle Tom controversy. She gathered isolated and abnormal facts and wove them into a sensational narrative. She had the novelist's liberty of giving what names she chose to the victim of the story, and, to further her main purpor is, she selected the name of one of our most honored Southern statesmen, to drag in the mire. When she made the name of Legare the synonym of cruelty and oppression, she already prejudged the whole Southern question, and libelled its best defenders and noblest representatives. Nothing could be more dexterous. This sort Gold Room, said he was too "damned mad to of attack admits of no reply. When a character in fiction is so contructed as to tans in Alabama and Mississippi is building a awaken horror and detestation, the name cotton mili. Boston capital is largely assisting given to that character itself becomes odious. Mrs. Stowe knew this very well. She took advantage of the circumstance. She having heard of the extortions of New York gathered together the most piquant and exhackmen, refused to pay more than five cents | treme cases of outrage which had occurred on Red River plantations and other remote regions, whose fertility has invited men of broken character and broken fortunes and reckless adventure (as well as men of character and capital,) and represented this social chaos as a fair sample of life at the South. She erected a scene of thrilling each of the annual value of $250, have been horror-a Walpurgis night of outraged innocence and hellish glee, and enthroned in the midst of its tumult, of blood-stained virgins, of witches and of devils, a master fiend whom she named Legare. Such was the strategy of Mrs. Stowe in her campaign against Southern society. Uncle Tom's Cabin was erected on the principle of the "Swamp Angel;" it was distant, safe, dastardly, destructive and inaccessible.

Had not the world been hostile to the institutions of the South, so unfair a libel towards satisfying the ravenous demands of would have been denounced by honorable and generous spirits everywhere. The remarkable dramatic skill of the book would not have saved it from the condemnation due to its malignant unfairness. What would men think of a story, spicy with the the most shocking details of the tragedy were grouped; what would they think of tempted to draw General Horace Porter, the such a story if it were foisted upon the public President's private secretary, into the plot, by as a just representation of the state of Northern society? Who would not protest against 16th, that they had purchased half a million | the malicious libel ? To legitimize such of gold on his account. On September 19th, travesties would be to enthrone falsehood, General Porter wrote to the speculators that to sacrifice to sensation the fair fame of any he had not authorized the purchase of gold country the novelist might chance to dislike, or of any institution, however sacred, which he sought to overthrow. Yet against such attacks the injured party is defenceless. So long as there is wrong doing in from its mother's arms to the ground. The ardanger, rushed to the door and leaped from Tom's Cabins can be built by the malevolent, the train. As soon as possible the cars were and "keys" of any required shape or patstopped, and backed to the spot, where every tern can be fitted to them by the readers of newspapers, by resident invalids, and by traboth mother and child. But, strange to say, velling correspondents. The sport is as easy, as safe, and, let us add, as magnanimous as the pelting of frogs in a pond.

Happily or unhappily, detraction 'grows by what it feeds on. No habit is so hard to break as that of confessing other people's nection of her greatest modern poet. The same cold-blooded sagacity is displayed in this case as in the other. The crime she charges upon Byron is well nigh beyond the range of public discussion. The justification she adduces for the horrid and prurient revelation is the claim of friendship, peared in the grave or been locked up in the memories of men bound under the most sacred obligations of secrecy. In the wild and wayward poems of Byron, especially in his dramas, and in the mystifications in which he delighted, there may be found plausible honored lady, whose virtue is now assailed, has passed from the stage, leaving two She has planted her cannon in an inaccessideath upon the defenceless homes of the Byron family.

gaged in a task quite as honorable as if she had been insulting the affections and ruining the fair fame of his living relatives, and cioli would scorn to play. They are the Cotton Spinning.

The condition of the cotton manufactures in this country and in Europe is the subject of earnest discussion on both sides of the Atlantic. England, France and the New England States of the American Union are alike discussing the best means of preventing a loss of their trade, and of securing themselves against disastrous competition. In England, an enormous monied capital, backed by the whole power of the government, is ready to be used in recovering the old markets or in forming new ones. "And not a day too soon! The continent of Europe is far less dependent than formerly on the cotton goods of Manchester, and the American demand, in consequence of the increase in domestic manufactures, is steadily de creasing. Commercial treaties do not stop the gap. Take the treaty with France as an example, which treaty, while it secured the English a market for their coal, annihilated their silk manufactures. What is now proposed is nothing less than the removal of the entire cotton manufacture to India; to establish the factories there, and by the aid of low prices, for labor as well as the raw material; to undersell both European and American manufacturers. In France, a similar scheme is under con sideration. There the proposition is to transfer the cotton factories from the northern departments to the southern portion of the Empire. During the last six months the Austrian port of Trieste has imported from Bombay twice as many bales as France received. This gave rise to the suggestion to move the factories nearer to the supply of raw mate rial and nearer to the seaboard. In both instances the principle is the same-to bring the cotton mill closer to the cotton port and

A similar idea is beginning to attract attention in mechanical New England. The obvious truth that cotton can be procured and manufactured at a lower price in the South, where it is produced, than in the Northern factories, to which it is conveyed at great expense, is opening the eyes of the spinners. This has taken firm hold of the Southern mind, and New England must either move its mills down South, as England proposes to move the mills of Lancaster to India, or must submit to be driven out of the market by the produce of the Southern factories. Nearly one hundred million dollars is invested in cotton mannfacturing establishments in the New England and Central States. This is the extent of the interest which is felt in the manufacturing progress of the South.

Notwithstanding the failure of Senato Sprague to lead the revolution in cotton spinning, of which he spoke so glibly, there is still a prospect that Northern capital and Northern machinery will gradually find their way to the South. It can, moreover, be can use their surplus machinery here more profitably than in distant Hindostan. Upon the same continent they would find the raw material, the means of manufacturing, and a sufficient market-a market more hard to be satisfied as the broad plains of the West are made rich by the labors of the immigrant and the passage of the locomotive.

to replace the American staple, though sacks of English gold have been scattered broadcast among the cotton planters of India. Old King Cotton holds his own, and both England and New England are forced to acknowledge his sway. In the meanwhile, our people have an excellent opportunity of making themselves rich and independent. Money is flowing steadily into the cotton States. The surplus capital is already large. It cannot be invested in negroes, and of land there is more than enough. Where, then, can it be applied to more advantage than in the manufacture of cotton? In no case has a well-managed cotton mill been upprofitable, and we can lay our finger upon a dozen which are earning large dividends. The Southern mill can make money when it sens varns at the price which they cost to manufacture in New England. The risk is small and the gain is great; not only in hard money, but in the opening of new channels of industry, in giving enlarged opportunities of employment to the people, and in keeping in the country the money which now slips into the pocket of the Northerner and

The subject is well worthy of practical attention, and we hope that our people, not thinking too long, will be convinced of the wisdom of beginning at once the great work of making South Carolina an important manufacturing State.

The State Fair.

The advices from the interior of the State are now very encouraging, and indicate that preparations are making on all sides for a visit to Columbia during the State Fair.
